■ Project updates & viewpoints

The tide is turning for carers 12

Anna Gaughan explains how a growing UK-wide network, tide – together in dementia everyday, is ensuring that the expertise of carers influences dementia policy, research and practice

Music Mirrors reminiscence resource 14

Amy Semple and Heather Edwards report on Music Mirrors, which offers a low cost, digitally portable reminiscence resource for gathering musical memories in one place

Replacing DoLS: proposals appraised 16

Impressive proposals from the Law Commission could spell the end of the widely disliked Deprivation of Liberty Safeguards. David Jolley says the new plans will be cheaper and more manageable

Culture and ethnicity: a community of practice 18

“Communities of practice” are a popular way to promote mutual learning. Julia Botsford and colleagues describe how a new one focusing on culture and ethnicity is making a difference.

■ Features

A response framework with untruths as last resort 22

Sometimes the truth causes distress, but is it ever right to lie to a person with dementia? Edward O'Connor, Ian James and Roberta Caiazza describe a practical framework which allows “therapeutic lies” as a last resort

A poet's stories 26

It is 20 years since John Killick published his first book of poems inspired by conversations with people with dementia. Recently, he has been looking back on these formative experiences and he shares some of the poems which have resulted

Dying well with an intellectual disability and dementia 28

As more people with intellectual disabilities live into old age, the prevalence of dementia in this group is increasing. Kathryn Service and colleagues examine the challenges to dementia practice presented by intellectual disability

Care records that value the quality of experience 32

Quality care requires quality records because “if it isn't written down, it didn't happen,” say Jackie Pool and Libby Lawrence. They explain their concept of enriched care reporting as an effective method of reflecting the experience of care home residents
