The Herbert Protocol for people at risk 14

Rachel Good describes an early intervention scheme designed to help locate vulnerable people deemed to be at risk of going missing

'Train the trainer': how it worked in care homes 16

How do you train care home staff when staff turnover is high and everyone is busy all the time? Laura Cook and colleagues report on the findings of a potential solution in which staff themselves were recruited to train their colleagues

Kinecting through group digital games 18

Digital technologies offer lots of opportunities for people with dementia to enjoy games and engaging activities. Erica Dove and Arlene Astell describe their research project and the findings so far

■ Features

Dementia, human rights and BAME communities 22

Attempts to embed human rights in health care have failed to dislodge the medical model of service evaluation in the NHS. But David Truswell argues that a renewed effort is required to protect and promote health care rights, particularly where migrant and black and ethnic minority communities are concerned

An activity-based model for residential care 24

Activities should be a vital component of good care but are often neglected. William McMorran visited two exemplary day time activity centres abroad and argues that there are important lessons which could easily be carried over to residential care in the UK

End of life care: resources to strengthen support 28

As more people die with dementia, end of life care discussions are growing in importance. Alastair Macdonald and colleagues report on their study and explain how co-designing new resources could help to strengthen support at the end of life

Melodies and memories: music and cultural expression 32

James Tolhurst and Marc Block were commissioned to bring music to "culturally disadvantaged" people with dementia. How did it work out?
